van-type trucks housed the equipment used by the group.

25X1

The truck mounted a covered sheet steel box about 3 x 5 m. Entrance to the van was through a door in the rear.

25X1

The "lokatorschiki" wore artillery shoulder boards with the metallic signal insignia.

6.

Instructions were oral. CO, Lt. Col. Aleksey Ivanovich OLENIN, would be informed of an alert by phone from the Chief of Staff, 23rd AAA Div. OLENIN would then issue oral instructions to the officers and EM of the Special Section of Counterintelligence. Each officer and EM knew his duties and carried them out.

[redacted]

The only "sverksrochniki" [redacted] were chauffeurs in the Directorate of Counterintelligence in Baden. One senior sergeant in the Special Section of Counterintelligence, who had been acting First Sergeant, was to be demobilized in December 1952. The CO of the section asked him to extend and he was promoted to First Sergeant. Then information was received that funds were not available to pay him the "sverksrochniki" rate. Consequently, he joined one of the AAA regiments of the 23rd AAA div.

First degree GTO consisted of the following:

- a. Three kilometer run
- b. Sixteen various physical exercises
- c. Four to five pull ups
- d. An obstacle course, consisting of a run across a wooden barrier two meters high, crawling under a row of barbed wire obstacles, running the length of a wooden log, jumping across three log barriers, and finally a grenade throw from a crater hole into a dummy wooden building.

Second degree GTO consisted of the following:

- a. Ten kilometer run
- b. Sixteen various physical exercises
- c. Five to six pull ups
- d. Exercises on crossbar
- e. Exercises on parallel bars
- f. A 100 m swim with carbine
- g. Leap into water from a height of two to three meters.
- h. Obstacle course run (same as first degree test)

Though the tests were not necessarily required of civilians in the USSR, they were a "must" in the Soviet Army.
